But they always seem to set you back a pretty good chunk of cash. A new app that's inspired by a brand of inexpensive, rugged airbrushes aims to change that. But it's the virtual airbrush that may end up being the most useful. Virtual Airbrush Studio, which was developed by Quip—the makers of the new iPad 2—uses a somewhat crude yet recognizable style of illustration to mimic the same "brushless" features of more expensive, actual airbrushes. You can create the outline and line of an object, then fill that with colors.

Then use a highly customizable stylus to make the desired adjustments to those fills, moves, and strokes. It's very simple, yet it has immense depth. If you're talking about spraying color directly on the screen, though, Virtual Airbrush Studio is still rather limited. You can't do as much with the graphic aspect of the app as you can a physical airbrush like the Tweekner, especially if you want to color in a layer. But considering the price of the latter, that's really not such a huge deal. After all, it's impossible to exceed the limits of an airbrush in terms of its complexity and versatility, anyway. If you want to try your hand at painting directly on the iPad, you can do that, too, but it's much easier to just pull out your $80-$100 real airbrush, give it some gas and spray away.

Q: How to populate a data frame with the full address in a spatial polygon? I have a spatial polygon shapefile and I want to use the full address (street number, city, state, zip code) for each record in a data frame, using the `neighborhood.shapefile()` from the `rgeos` package. It seems to be the case that the address for the
